He was introduced to the auditione as a young man whose achievement was such as to promise much for the future and moreover he was given a place in the postoffice—as I have said. This was long before the day of civil service reform.

Now, to the wrong kind of man all this might have meant nothing at all. But in Joe Murray's case it meant everything He was by nature as straight a man, as fearless and as stanchly loyal, as any one whom I have ever met, a man to be trusted in any position demanding courage, integrity, and good faith. He did his duty in the public service, and became devoteity attached to the organization which he feit had given him his chance in life. Next fall, as the elections draw hear. Joe thought he would like to make of knowing. So they had stumbled a drive at Jake Heas, and after considerable planning decided that his best on, from almost the very first, chance lay in the fight for the nomination to the assembly, the lower house of the legislature. He picked me as the candidate with whom he would be most likely to win, and win he did. It was not my fight, it was loces and likely to win, and win he did. It was not my fight, it was loces and dissecting their differences each try-like reputation nor the ability to have won the nomination for myself, and indeed never would have thought of trying for it.

Jake Mess was entirely good humored about it. In spite of my bing anti-machine, my relations with him had been friendly and human, and when he was beaten he turned in to hetp Joe elect me. At first they thought they would take me on a personal convass through the saleons along Sixth avenue. The canvass, however, did not last beyond the first saleon. I was introduced with proper selemnity to the saleon keeper a very important personage, for this was before the days when saleons keepers became merely the mortgaged chattels of the brewers and he begin to cross-examine me, a little too much in the tone of one who was dealing with a suppliant for his favor. He said he expected that I would of course treat the liquor husiness fairly, to which I answered, none too instead of on her work. She had left cordinity, that I hoped I should treat all interests fairly. He then said that he regarded the licenses as too high, to which I responded that I believed they were really not high enough, and that I should try to have them made higher. The conversation threatened to become story. Messrs Murray and Hess, oh some hastily improvised plea, took me out into the street, and then Joe explained to me that it was not worth my while staying in Sixth avenue any longer, that I had better go right back to Fifth avenue and attend to my friends there, and that he would look after my interests on had a clear, straightforward of the domestic to the street of the stars foreshadow an increase in the stars foreshadow an increase of believers in all sorts of psychie and spiritualistic phenomena, owing to many tales brought back from batters of the battles through which they had passed, a leg or an arm missing.
